The story begins with the patriarch of the family, John Madaris, a successful businessman who falls in love with a young woman named Mary. Mary is from a poor family, and John's parents disapprove of their relationship. However, John and Mary are determined to be together, and they elope.

The couple has three children, but their happiness is short-lived. John dies in a car accident, and Mary is left to raise their children on her own. She struggles to make ends meet, and the children often go hungry. Mary eventually remarries, but her second husband is abusive. She divorces him and moves back to her hometown with her children.

As the children grow older, they begin to learn about their father's family. They are intrigued by the stories they hear, and they decide to travel to the town where their father grew up. They are surprised to find that their father's family is still there, and they are welcomed with open arms.

The children soon learn that their father's family is not as wealthy as they had imagined. They live in a modest house, and they work hard to make a living. However, they are a close-knit family, and they are always there for each other.

The children spend the summer with their father's family, and they begin to feel a sense of belonging. They learn about their father's childhood, and they come to understand why he left home. They also learn about the secret love that their father had for their mother.

When the summer is over, the children return home to their mother. They are changed by their experience, and they have a new appreciation for their family. They know that their father loved them, and they are determined to make him proud.
